

Hullo friends!

I hope this letter finds you all well . . . well, as well as can be expected after all the strangeness, the fighting, and whatever accident befell Glendelle (still not sure what happened).

Now, the word going around is that we'll be heading back to the Glitterfall. That's . . . well, that's a big place, isn't it? Bigger than Petalwood, that's for sure! They say you can walk for hours and still not bump into the same cabbage-seller twice. (Though why you'd need two cabbages, I don't rightly know.)

Anyway, I'm told there'll be a few weeks of quiet in-between. A chance to breathe, and rest, and think about what comes next. I reckon each of you might want to do different things during this time, and it seems only fair that you get to decide what that is.

Maybe you'll want to:

- Train with some master of sword, spell, or song.
- Hunt down rumors, secrets, or hidden lore that's been whispered only in the capital's darker taverns.
- Work on your craft, whether that's brewing, smithing, or trying to teach me the difference between a hammer and a ladle.
- Visit shrines, temples, or old friends (or enemies, I s'pose).
- Or just eat and drink until your boots don't fit, which seems like a noble pursuit to me.

But don't let me make the rules, you can try for anything you like.

Big or small, silly or serious, it's your story to tell. Even if it's just you and your best friend Rinji watching the stars in the night sky, or you and your best friend Rinji shopping for new belts.

So! Think on it, won't you? What would your character want to do with some weeks of peace and choice in their hands? Send your thoughts my way, and I'll do my best to make sure the world remembers your deeds.

Rinji's best friend
